Section 301 Investigations: Foreign Digital Services Taxes (DSTs)

Background
An international debate is occurring over the global taxing rights of revenues and profits earned by multinational corporations (MNCs) in certain “digital economy” sectors. This debate is driven by concerns that these MNCs are not adequately taxed, and some governments argue that the right to tax some of the MNC profits should be reallocated from the jurisdiction where the MNC claims residence to the jurisdiction where the MNC’s customers are located.

Some countries have imposed unilateral digital services taxes (DSTs) on the gross revenues earned by digital economy MNCs. These taxes target certain MNC digital transactions with domestic businesses or online activities directed ultimately towards domestic users, even if the corporation does not have a physical presence in the country. The Trump Administration and others contend that, based on their design, many of these DSTs disproportionately target large U.S. MNCs. In addition, some observers argue that the proliferation of such unilateral measures could undermine basic principles of the current international taxation system.

The United States and more than 130 countries, comprising both members and nonmembers of the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), are negotiating policy recommendations in an attempt to update the global tax system and develop an international digital tax framework. The OECD Secretariat originally announced its intent to conclude these negotiations by the end of 2020, although there are doubts about the feasibility of this timeline due to the Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) pandemic and critical policy differences among countries.

Despite ongoing negotiations at the OECD, some countries, particularly in Europe and Asia, have proposed, announced, or implemented DSTs. France’s DST—by far the most controversial—was the subject of a 2019 investigation by the U.S. Trade Representative (USTR), under Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974. More recently, the USTR launched a new investigation into the implemented or proposed DSTs of 10 other U.S. trading partners.

Overview of Section 301
Title III of the Trade Act of 1974 (Sections 301-310, codified at 19 U.S.C. §§2411-2420), titled “Relief from Unfair Trade Practices,” is often collectively referred to as “Section 301.” It grants the USTR a range of responsibilities and authorities to impose trade sanctions on foreign countries that violate U.S. trade agreements or engage in acts that are “unjustifiable,” “unreasonable,” or “discriminatory” and burden U.S. commerce. Prior to 1995, the United States used Section 301 to unilaterally pressure other countries to eliminate trade barriers and open their markets to U.S. exports. The creation of an enforceable dispute settlement mechanism in the World Trade Organization (WTO), strongly supported at the time by the United States, significantly reduced the use of Section 301.

The United States retains the flexibility to determine whether to seek recourse for foreign unfair trade practices in the WTO or under Section 301. The Statement of Administrative Action (SAA)—which explained how U.S. agencies would implement the 1994 Uruguay Round Agreements Act (URAA or “WTO Agreements”)—states that the USTR will invoke the dispute settlement procedures of the WTO Dispute Settlement Understanding (DSU) for investigations that involve an alleged violation of (or the impairment of U.S. benefits under) WTO Agreements. At the same time, the SAA makes clear that “[n]either section 301, nor the DSU will require the” USTR to do so if it “does not consider that a matter involves” WTO Agreements. Such a determination appears to be solely at the USTR’s discretion. However, the USTR’s decision to bypass WTO dispute settlement and impose retaliatory measures (if any) in response to a Section 301 investigation may be challenged at the WTO.

France’s Digital Services Tax
France enacted a DST formally on July 24, 2019. The DST applies retroactively to digital services revenue as of January 1, 2019, and is a 3% levy on gross revenues derived from two digital activities of which French “users” are deemed to play a major role in value creation: (1) intermediary services, and (2) advertising services based on users’ data. The law excludes certain services, including digital interfaces for the delivery of “digital content.” The DST applies only to companies with annual revenues from the covered services of at least €750 million ($888 million) globally and €25 million ($30 million) in France. Covered companies are required to calculate revenues attributable to France (and, therefore, covered by the DST) using formulas specified in the law.

Section 301 Investigation of French DST
In its investigation, initiated on July 10 and completed on December 2, 2019, the USTR concluded that France’s DST discriminates against major U.S. digital companies and is inconsistent with prevailing international tax policy principles. While France suspended its DST earlier this year for the remainder of 2020, and it agreed to continue working with the United States at the OECD to reach a compromise on international digital taxation, the USTR ultimately determined to take retaliatory action in the form of additional duties. On July 10, 2020, the agency announced that it would impose additional tariffs of 25% on approximately $1.3 billion worth of imports, or about 2.2% of all U.S. goods imports from the France in 2019. The USTR faced a July 6 statutory deadline to make a determination on what action to take but stated that it will delay the implementation for up to 180 days (that is, up to January 6, 2021). USTR’s announcement confirms that it is suspending the action to allow more time for bilateral and multilateral discussions that could lead to a satisfactory resolution of this matter. However, USTR’s notice contemplates the possibility that the action could be modified or the 180-day suspension shortened, depending on the progress of discussions with France.

The list of imports on which the USTR determined to impose tariffs is narrower than that originally proposed in December 2019, which had an annual import value of approximately $2.4 billion, covered dairy products, soaps, cosmetics, sparkling wine, handbags, and porcelain, and contemplated possible fees or restrictions on services of France. The final list is limited to certain cosmetics, soaps, and leather goods. According to the USTR, in determining the level of trade affected by the action, the agency considered the value of digital transactions covered by France’s DST and the amount of taxes that would be assessed by France on U.S. companies.

New Section 301 Investigation

On June 2, 2020, the USTR launched a new Section 301 investigation into the DSTs adopted or under consideration by Austria, Brazil, the Czech Republic, the European Union, India, Indonesia, Italy, Spain, Turkey, and the United Kingdom (see textbox). The USTR also requested consultations with the governments of these jurisdictions.

As part of the ongoing investigation, the agency may seek to address several issues, including

- Are the taxes discriminatory and do they burden or restrict U.S. commerce? Are these jurisdictions unfairly targeting the taxes at certain U.S. firms?
- What are the implications of applying the taxes retroactively? Some taxes are (or will be) applied retroactively, raising administrative and legal questions as to how firms will be able to calculate their potential liabilities.
- Is the tax policy “unreasonable”? The USTR has indicated that these DSTs appear to diverge from norms reflected in U.S. and international tax systems, particularly because of their extraterritorial scope and their taxing of revenue instead of income.
- Are the DSTs inconsistent with international commitments and obligations under the WTO or other agreements?
- Does the WTO General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS) cover digital trade? If so, the USTR may invoke the dispute settlement procedures of the WTO DSU.

Outlook

If an agreement is not reached at the OECD in the near term, and the USTR determines that the DST of any countries under investigation is unreasonable or discriminatory and actually burdens or restricts U.S. commerce, the USTR could seek to negotiate and enter into a binding agreement that commits these trading partners to eliminate the tax policy or that provides compensation to the United States. Absent mutual resolution, some analysts foresee the most likely scenario as imposition of tariffs and escalation of tensions in U.S. economic relations with these trading partners. Should the United States impose retaliatory trade measures, the affected parties could pursue WTO dispute settlement or retaliate by targeting U.S. exports.
